To determine the ability of cerebrospinal fluid (CSF) brain natriuretic peptide (BNP) to predict the development of postdural puncture headache (PDPH) in adults undergoing lumbar puncture (LP). Retrospective cohort study at a single institution. Tertiary care university hospital. Patients with no prior history of CSF leakage or LP were monitored for 3 months and considered eligible for study if their initial post-LP CT head was normal. Four hundred fifty-two consecutive eligible patients were enrolled (response rate, 64%). CSF BNP level was measured by enzyme-linked immunosorbent assay. Three hundred fifty-seven eligible patients had an LP without developing PDPH, which was the control group. One hundred ten patients developed PDPH, which was the study group. Patients in the study group had a significantly higher CSF BNP level at diagnosis than the control group. CSF BNP level at diagnosis was significantly higher in the study group when compared with control patients with PDPH at 48 (42-62) pg/mL versus 10 (8-15) pg/mL (P or not we can choose to do better. This is the case with Matt Schutte, who's been working on a small, fuel-efficient motor for his 2010 Ford F-150. He developed his first prototypes using a CNC mill that his now-wife and business partner, Cherie, picked up at a garage sale. He later built an improved design using two motors mounted in a custom frame. It works. The motor—the first part of the system Schutte describes as "quite a bit different than any other aftermarket propulsive system on the market"—is the brainchild of Schutte, who's an electrical engineer at Ford. (He's also the father of two teenage children). His first design, which sent a single-cylinder Ford engine spinning inside a little box attached to the rear axle, was powered by a generator hooked up to a 30-horsepower motor, which he built from scratch. After a few years, Schutte had other ideas. He decided he'd rather have a higher-horsepower motor 0cc13bf012
