stones, and on the right is a castle with a black roof and red background. The present invention relates to the field of steel or other metal cutters or shears; and more specifically, the present invention relates to the region which joins together the two jaws of a hand-held cutter. Many types of hand-held cutting instruments or shears have been available for many years; and in particular, knives having portions connected with each other by a junction region which can be folded together. For many years, metal cutters or shears have been either rigidly attached, or pivotally connected. One example of a prior art rigid connection can be found in the knife disclosed in U.S. Pat. No. 3,088,131 which is shown attached to the knife block of a table saw.

The disadvantages of this type of connection are that they are not very durable, are restricted in their use and the various size knife blocks, and the requirement of a knife block to attach the knife.

Another example of a prior art connection can be found in U.S. Pat. No. 5,787,462 which discloses a type of metal cutter where the handle is pivoted to the cutting head. There is a split portion formed in the handle which is joined to a similar split portion formed in the cutting head. The two halves are pivoted together about a pivot point created by the joining of two portions of the split portions with a pin. However, this type of connection is not very secure, it cannot be used with many types of hand-held cutting instruments, it is not very durable, and it does not permit the design of custom blades for the
