PAUL, Minn. — What is the difference between a Viking and a moose, and do Vikings really drink mead? Those were just a few of the questions posed Friday to “Viking Day” at the Minnesota Historical Society. A Viking from the Cuyuna Iron Range led the presentation, which provided a window into the past, but also a clue to the present. “Vikings may not have gotten here without springing forth from [Cuyuna] because we’ve got all these wolf canoes in the hills here that were built here,” said Iduna Beebe, an archaeologist and the director of the Minnesota Historical Society’s Loring Fargo Center for Minnesota History. “So we owe our very existence to the area around us.” The history-focused festival was meant to celebrate Viking explorations, but also to quell some misconceptions about the Vikings. A popular misconception is that Vikings were

The availability of digital radiographs provides new possibilities for evaluating chronic spine disease. However, certain difficulties arise with respect to the interpretation of radiographs obtained for alternative purposes. To assess the influence of the radiation dose and the presence of soft tissue oedema on the interpretation of focal erosions in the intervertebral disc. This retrospective study included a homogeneous series of 182 magnetic resonance imaging scans to be correlated with both digital radiographs and traditional photographs. Three observers, blinded to each other's readings, interpreted the radiographs and photographs independently. Bland-Altman analysis was carried out to assess interobserver agreement and the influence of the radiation dose and the presence of the oedema on the interobserver disagreement. A statistically significant, but rather low, level of agreement was observed between the three observers with regard to the digital radiographs, with a minimum value of
