Content addresses are bits of data used to identify various pieces of content (e.g., documents, images, video, etc.) stored on a computer network. Because of the ability to have multiple pieces of content with similar content addresses, content addressability allows for finding duplicate content on the Internet. Most content addressable protocols exist in a client/server format, where the server may identify a content address in order to find content that matches that content address. For example, a computer may contact a server to find if it has previously seen a particular image. In this case, the server returns an identification of the image and a content address associated with the image if the image is found. In other cases, the server may return the content address and, if found, ask that the client contact the server at the content address in order to request the content. In still other cases, the server may contact another server or client to find the content. Once the client locates the content that matches the content address, the content may be downloaded to the client or may be played in some other way. By identifying the content at a content address, content matching can be centralized. Furthermore, caching servers may have copies of content that has already been stored in a cache in order to improve client access times.
