Transcendental Meditation (TM) is a technique in which an individual is trained to become aware of (or familiar with) one's own mind and thoughts, as well as to remain aware of these in a nonjudgmental and nonreactive way without engaging in emotional reactivity. The technique is commonly practiced in group sessions of two to six people. Transcendental Meditation is a sequence of four steps: Learning, Observing, Reflecting and Transcending that teaches a person to become aware of the mind and experiences of that person, and to develop the skill of being able to observe and transcend the mind and its thoughts and feelings. Physiological and anatomical changes in carotid body type I cells after long-term hypoxia. We have examined the effects of long-term hypoxia (10 days at an altitude of 3,500 m) in vitro on the ultrastructure, catecholamine metabolism and metabolic capacities of carotid body type I cells in the rat. Cells were plated in MCDDB-131 medium (Sigma Diagnostics, Inc., St. Louis, MO) at a concentration of 1.0×10^5 cells/ml and grown for up to 10 days. They were placed in a blood gas incubator (Bair-Hughes, Inc.) at 37 degrees C in air or in a hypoxic environment of less than 5% O₂-95% N₂, with medium change and gas exchange every 2 days, for 10 days. We found that the majority of cell types underwent all of the following changes by day 10: ultrastructural evidence of deterioration, increased mitochondrial size and accumulation of lipid droplets, reduced lipid droplet content, loss of large dense-cored vesicles, and a change in the appearance of the mitochondria, being more electron dense. Basal and isoproterenol-stimulated catecholamine synthesis was reduced approximately 80% by day 10. There was a marked decrease in isoproterenol-stimulated cyclic AMP production. The Km value for exogenous adenosine deaminase, which converts endogenous adenosine to inosine, increased about 8-fold after 10 days in vitro. The change in the Km value reflected the decrease in the capacity to synthesize catecholamines from exogenous substrates. These changes indicate that carotid body type I cells adapt to chronic hypoxia in part by altering their morphological and biochemical properties. An ear used as an accessory for a human's ear, is called an ear hook. In general, for the reasons that the ear hook is formed in the form of a stainless steel hoop and cannot be changed, the ear hook is typically formed as a single part. The state of the art ear hook is typically formed in the form of a two-piece ear hook, as shown in FIG 0cc13bf012
