Trevor Anderson was surprised when he got a legal notice for an unpaid fine that was served to him through the post. He was charged for a parking fine from Auckland's West Harbour. "I was like, 'I've parked around the corner for years and years'. I thought maybe I had to pay for parking, but when I looked at the notice it said fines and costs $10," Mr Anderson said. "I had to get a lawyer to help me out. It cost me $80." Mr Anderson rang the council and they admitted they issued the wrong legal notice, but he still had to pay it or a second notice would be issued. He still had to pay the $80 fee before he could be issued with a second legal notice, because only an attorney can close your business. The on-road parking ban was introduced in May. When the council issued the first legal notice, they didn't realise it was for parking. Mr

MGB: Let's talk about the dungeons. Are there any tips or tricks to getting through them in a "graceful" way? For example, to utilize party members, or avoid excessive use? What are your thoughts on Raid Dungeon mode as compared to Story Mode?
Yashy: There are numerous ways to play, and every player has a different way of playing, but as long as you are willing to learn, the dungeons can be entered more gracefully. If you are willing to experiment with the command system, you can assign commands for use between battles. Apart from the interactions between characters in the command list, you can also set the commands that you want to perform automatically with specific conditions. You can set the conditions for combat with different battle ranges. You can select the distances for stamina and defense. If we consider the dungeons in Divination Vale, there are about 10-20 dungeons in which you can find the different types of bosses. Raid Dungeon mode and Story mode will be completed when you gain the minimum amount of EXP and GIL required for the final boss. The difficulties of the bosses are balanced between these two modes, so it is a completely different experience. MGB: The

The present invention relates to the field of semiconductor processing and, more particularly, to the field of ion beam etching and lithography. In semiconductor processing, for example, ion beam etching, a gas, such as CF<sub>4</sub>, is ionized by a radiofrequency (RF) or microwave field and is accelerated toward a semiconductor substrate. The plasma reactants produce volatile by-products which are taken away from the substrate by a vacuum pump. This technique is used for both physical-vapor-deposited (PVD) film etching as well as for the removal of photoresist, leaving behind a patterned film. Recently, laser printing has been used to selectively remove portions of the polymer layer, forming a patterned photoresist layer on the substrate which is used as a mask in subsequent processing. This technique is known as direct write lithography. However, there are significant limitations to the resolution obtainable using laser patterning. For example, with the use of an energy source, such as an Argon laser, at a wavelength of 351 nm, no more than a 125 nm space may be written. While other techniques are able to improve resolution, these still suffer from drawbacks. In direct write lithography, the energy per unit area is often too low and the energy distribution is usually non-uniform. As a result, the surface of the photoresist is typically damaged and does not allow for good resist profile definition. Ion beam etching provides an alternative to laser direct-write lithography. In ion beam etching, ions are accelerated toward a substrate, desirably with a beam angle as close to perpendicular as possible. Thus, unlike in laser direct write lithography, the primary energy is not the energy of the actual particle, but rather is the energy of the accelerated ions that strikes the surface of the substrate. As a result, the ions are relatively low energy, which gives rise to a number of advantages. When direct write lithography is used, the energy is injected to a relatively thick layer of the
