What's new in The Cave:

(opera) The Cave (French: Le souterrain), Op. 25, is a dramatic one-act opera on a libretto by Paul Claudel with a score composed by Jacques Offenbach and orchestrated by Charles Lamotte. It was their third collaboration, following a book by Claudel (Les deux autels), music by Offenbach (The Grand Duke) and the libretto by Edmond Fleg. In German, the work was originally known as Der Höllenhund (or Der Höllenhund) with texts by Robert Fitz-James Stuart. The opera opened at the Théâtre de l'Ambigu-Comique in Paris on 16 January 1895, and ran for eight performances. The musical work is derived from an earlier poem by the romantic poet Albrecht von Euler, with a libretto in three stanzas. The principal characters are Brother Guido (Ausdruck, born Loomis) and Pundit Guillaume. The work was an instant success, staged in 1894 in Paris, London, New York, and Buenos Aires, and is still frequently performed in the concert hall repertoire. In 1896 it was performed at the Royal Opera House in London in both the first complete production of an Offenbach opera and the first production of a work by Claudel (the fifth in the history of opera). History and text The Cave was composed in four weeks in December 1893 and completed in January 1894. While the libretto is by Claudel, it was not his idea—as he put it: Personally, I would have preferred Guillaume or La Dame aux Camélias; the idea of taking on —no, with an air more or less theatrical—a scene at the bottom of the earth did not satisfy my sense of poetry and melodrama. Claudel explained his involvement with the selection of the libretto, and his dissatisfaction with Les deux autels (or Les deux autels and La Belle Hélène)—Norman Brooks says that he "gave up writing for the moment"—in terms of a development of his ideas as an artist, but also "from a sonet in search of a poem": The idea to write a libretto as a sonnet, and even as an epic poem in a certain way already existed. Of course, what I've also read has all
