Clinical outcome after intraoperative embolisation of the hepatic artery for liver tumours. Hepatic tumours are the second most common kind of liver tumours and hepatic metastases are often present, especially in patients with colorectal carcinomas. Surgical resection is the only curative treatment option. However, several tumours are associated with compromised liver function and thus patients with potentially resectable liver tumours are not eligible for major hepatectomy. In such cases, intraoperative hepatic artery embolisation (HAE) might provide a bridge to future surgical procedures and thus alternative approaches are being studied. This review analyses the clinical data from published studies on the use of HAE for liver tumours. HAE is a well tolerated, minimally invasive technique to perform. The combination of intraoperative analysis of the tumour size and the liver functionality with the use of the CO(2) liver warm-up technique makes the use of HAE a potential approach to safe resection of a wide range of liver tumours. Furthermore, tumour resection seems to have an important role in improving the overall survival of patients with colorectal carcinomas and HAE provides an important bridge to further interventions.
